THE SEXTON.

On a marble slab in the church yard old,

Sitteth the sexton gray,

Is singing its life away,

Falleth a gentle beam,

Playing along his frosted locks

At mid of night, as the olden year

Pale and cold from the half-hid moon

With a glittering silver gleam.

Little he recks the clinging damp,

From the dead entombed there.

He sleepeth now-on a sculptured urn

Nor the wind that springs with a lonely ch

As he bows in silent prayer:

He resteth his weary head, While noiseless round him gather

Little ones buried in olden time,

Brushing across his silvery locks

Risen from out the mould,

Ringlets of silken gold.

One of a fair and angel torm

Bendeth over him low;

Brow of heavenly snow,

Weary long years ago.

Penitent, sobing the while;

Shriven of all her guile.

Of the buried long ago.

He smileth, for in his dreaming,

He claspeth her fondly now.

Madge, with her tresses of sunny tint,

Who died sin-broken and scorned of all,

Now, in God's Heaven of Holy Love,

Softly the pillows the old man's head

Whispering tales of the olden time.

On her bosom of driven snow,

Madge, who had died on his heaving breast,

All of his angel dead.
